The Digital Age

Diversity for the Next Generation of Leadership

Just Social Action

American Buddhism is thriving in ways that defy many negative societal trends and is offering real hope to bring healing and wisdom to our wider society. Mindfulness training has taken root in schools, the workplace, and in our homes. Smart phone apps and other digital technologies are making authentic Buddhist teachings and the most respected Buddhist teachers widely available, regardless of geographic location.

And while sharing some of the broader society's challenges surrounding gender and racial equity, American Buddhist sanghas are giving rise to a new generation of leadership: women, people of color, members of the LGBTQ community, millennials and Gen Y. Our conference will address the ethical exercise of leadership's power and governance in the modern age.

The Frederick P. Lenz Foundation and Naropa University are co-hosting a series of online conversations and a multi-day conference for Lenz grantees, academic colleagues, Buddhist leaders and practitioners, and all interested in the topic of the Future of American Buddhism. The online program will launch in the spring of 2021 and the conference will be held on June 2-5, 2022
